Researchers from the Columbia University School of Public Health used two sets of data from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration: the 2007 National Roadside Survey of Alcohol and Drug Use by Drivers and the Fatality Analysis Reporting System. Both showed information on drug and alcohol use while being involved in a car crash. People who were in fatal car crashes were overall more likely to be on drugs than those that weren’t. Fifty-seven percent of those in fatal crashes had high blood alcohol levels, compared to only 8.8 percent of those interviewed in the roadside survey, while 20.5 percent of fatal crashes involved drivers who tested positive for alcohol and at least one drug compared to 2.2 percent of the roadside survey participants.

In 2007, the Netherlands banned the sales of alcohol in marijuana cafés, in part, due to a growing body of U.S. and European research demonstrating the synergistic effect of alcohol combined with marijuana and its effects on driving. Substances abusers often refer to the condition of being intoxicated on both marijuana and alcohol as “faded” or “crossfaded.”

Oregon ranks 6th in the U.S. for self-reported Past Year Drug Driving, according to the National Survey on Drug Use and Health.

NSDUH ranks these States as having the highest self-reported rates of past year “Drug Driving” 5.4%-7.8%
